CCSEM Analysis and Results

Computer Controlled Scanning Electron Microscopy (CCSEM) is based upon automated feature analysis performed using the Personal Scanning Electron Microscope (PSEM). CCSEM analysis gathers information regarding size, shape, and elemental composition on a particle-by-particle basis. The data thus acquired for a large number of features are then tabulated in order to summarize and report the results.

Six samples (3044317, 3044321, 3044322, 3044328, 3044329, 3044332) were analyzed by CCSEM techniques. A representative fraction of sample particulate was deposited onto a polycarbonate filter such that individual particles were not touching each other, then given a thin coat of carbon to prevent charging while under the electron beam. Each sample was placed into the SEM where fields were searched for particles. Particle edges were detected as being brighter than the sample substrate. The particle periphery points are detected and various size measures were calculated, including average diameter, maximum diameter, periphery length, etc. Once the particle was sized, the beam was placed within the particle and the elemental composition was determined based on energy dispersive spectroscopy (EDS). A thickness was assumed and the density was estimated based on the elemental composition so that the particle mass could be calculated. The analysis was performed at three magnifications. The data from each of the higher magnifications were prorated to the area analyzed at the lowest magnification.

The data are summarized as mass percent by compositional class. The compositional classes include chlorite, feldspar, hornblende, muscovite, clinozoisite, quartz, sepiolite and serpentine. A general aluminosilicate class and another class were also defined. The mass percent distributions by compositional class are shown for the six samples in Table 1. Overall, the samples were dominated by feldspar and chlorite. Quartz and hornblende were present in amounts greater than 5%. The remaining components were present in small amounts.
