1. Garrity Warning: At the commencement of, or as soon as it might become applicable during the course of, a voluntary investigatory interview, the Agency will provide an employee a warning regarding the employee's constitutional privilege against self-incrimination, which may be invoked when the employee reasonably believes their statements may be used against them in a criminal proceeding. An employee's refusal to respond based on a proper invocation of the privilege against self-incrimination may not be used as the sole basis for administrative disciplinary or adverse action. Evidentiary value of an employee's silence may be considered in administrative proceedings as part of the facts surrounding an investigation. Any statement provided by the employee may be used as evidence in criminal and/or administrative proceedings.

2. Kalkines Warning: At the commencement of a compelled investigatory interview, where prosecution has been declined by the appropriate authority, the Agency will provide an employee a warning that the employee's statements concerning the allegations during the interview cannot and will not be used against them in a subsequent criminal proceeding, unless the employee provides false statements or information; in which case, criminal proceedings may be instituted against the employee for falsifications. Refusal to answer or failure to respond truthfully to any questions may result in administrative disciplinary action.
