EPA Halts Formaldehyde IRIS Analysis As ACC Prepares For OPPT Review

EPA appears to have halted the long-running and controversial effort by its research office to assess the human health risks of formaldehyde, a move that could bolster efforts by the chemical industry which is preparing for the possibility that EPA's toxics office may select the chemical for evaluation, an approach the industry has long favored.

Judge Dismisses Suit Over EPA's Controversial Science Advisor Policy

A federal judge has found that environmentalists have standing to challenge the Trump administration's controversial policy barring EPA grant recipients from serving on its scientific advisory committees though he dismissed the suit on the merits, raising the bar for any appeal.

States Ramp Up Chemicals Management Legislation Despite TSCA Reform

At least 22 states are ramping up efforts to approve chemicals management legislation despite the sweeping overhaul of the Toxic Substances Control Act (TSCA) that some proponents hoped would end a patchwork of state chemicals rules, with observers saying states are â€œfilling inâ€• regulatory gaps EPA cannot address under the toxics law.

EPA's Draft PV29 Analysis Raises Legal Test Over TSCA Data Standards

Environmentalists and former EPA staff are raising multiple concerns that the agency's recently released draft assessment of pigment violet 29 (PV29), the first such assessment released since Congress reformed the Toxic Substances Control Act (TSCA), violates that statute, signaling they plan to sue if the agency does not change it.
